

YOUR LIFE

The government tries hard to entice young people into the military. Recruiters roam high schools, colleges, and malls and make endless phone calls to students at home. They don't talk about war or ask you to think about what it would be like to kill. Recruiters talk about college money and job training, but not . . .

- . . . that only half of GI Bill participants ever receive college funding;
- . . . that the unemployment rate for young veterans is twice as high as their peers who did not enlist;
- . . . that on any given night 200,000 veterans are homeless;
- . . . that returning to civilian life can be another kind of battle after war experiences;
- . . . that thousands of active-duty military people have risked dishonorable discharge or jail by speaking out, going AWOL, refusing to fight, asking about conscientious objector status, etc. as the reality of war conflicts with their beliefs.

Sources and more information: "Before You Enlist" on YouTube or projectyano.org; couragetoresist.org; National Network Opposing the Militarization of Youth, nnoym.org.

YOUR CHOICE

If you don't believe in it, will you pay for it? Each dollar sent to the Pentagon is money that can't be used for schools, job training, health care, aid to impoverished nations, infrastructure, mass transit, cleaning up the environment, and all kinds of other human service programs.

Each year thousands of people in the U.S. choose to keep their money away from the government. Like being conscientious objectors to military service, war tax resisters object to their tax dollars going to war and refuse to voluntarily pay for it. They often give the money to groups who take care of people instead. There are many ways to resist war taxes, and some methods includes risks such as collection efforts by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS).

If you have a job, chances are the federal government is taking some income taxes out of your paycheck. If you pay local telephone bills or buy alcohol, you're paying federal excise taxes that help pay for war too.

Find out what you can do to stop paying for war.

YOUR MONEY

The government may not get your body, but what about the money? With the high tech weapons and gear used today, the military needs money even more than it needs recruits.

- $17,500 gear for one U.S. soldier
- $140,000 video game for Army training
- $11,700,000 one Reaper drone (2010)
- $7,700,000,000 military recruiting budget (2008)
- $12,000,000,000 one mo. war in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan

Half of each federal tax dollar is used for the military: paying for past wars (veterans and debt), today's wars, and future wars (see the budget pie chart at warresisters.org). The monetary, human, and environmental costs of the wars in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan will not be fully known for years.

“We all take part in it — if you pay your taxes, you're taking part in this war. We all have a responsibility, as they determined after Nuremberg, whether you're the lowest soldier or the highest ranking general, or just a regular civilian, we all have responsibility . . . to resist and refuse enabling and condoning this criminal behavior.”

LT. EHREN WATADA
Veterans for Peace 2006 National Convention

LOCAL CONTACT: _____