In this un-narrated film, 28 American tax resisters relate via on-screen interviews their reasons and methods for withholding taxes from the U.S. government. Most say it is a matter of conscience barring them from financially supporting war or other actions they find morally unacceptable. They explain that tax resistance can range from including a protest letter with full payment to withholding payment completely. Some of the resisters say they have taken on lifestyles that keep them below the legal threshold for taxable income. Others explain their drawn-out dealings with the IRS. A placard at one point explains that of the tens of thousands of tax resisters since World War II, fewer than 30 have been jailed. The combination of the speakers' good humor and their apparent sincerity makes this film recommended for anyone interested in learning about using tax resistance as a method of protesting wars and war funding.—Lawrence Maxted, Gannon Univ.
